CICERO GOES TO THE FAIR

"Time to get up, Cicero!" Petunia Pig called, early one morning. "You have a lot of work to do today!"

"But this is the big day at the County Fair, Petunia!" Cicero protested, his voice muffled by bedclothes.

"It will be a big day for you, raking the lawn!" Petunia told her little cousin firmly. "Hurry and get up!"

A few minutes later Cicero clomped unhappily downstairs to the breakfast table.

"The Fair only comes once a year, and I've been saving my money to go!" Cicero grumbled. "I can rake the lawn any time."

"If you had raked the lawn yesterday, instead of playing marbles, you could have gone to the Fair today," Petunia reminded him. "Now you'll have to do your work before you go! And, just to make sure you get it done, I'll keep your bank!"

While Cicero sadly watched, Petunia locked up the money he had saved for the Fair.

It was not long after the muttering Cicero had gone out to start his work that Porky Pig rang the doorbell.

"H-Hello, P-Petunia," he said cheerfully. "Is C-Cicero here?"

"He's working in the yard," Petunia answered. Then she added quickly, "At least, that's what he's supposed to be doing!"

Petunia and Porky rushed into the yard. But Cicero was not there!

There was a glint in Petunia's eye. "He's gone to the Fair, after all!" she cried angrily. "And he hasn't one penny! We'll have to go and find him! C'mon, Porky!"

When they reached the gates to the Fair, Petunia rushed up to the ticket taker.

"Have you seen a fat little boy, trying to sneak in without buying a ticket?" she asked.

The ticket taker grinned. "I'm afraid there's more than one here this morning, Miss," he said. "You'll probably find him inside."

So Porky bought two tickets and in they went. Above their heads red, white, and blue banners swung in the breeze. Around them were brightly decorated booths full of kewpie dolls and fancy canes and wonderful prizes. The air was filled with the shouts of the sideshow men and the lilting music of the merry-go-round. But Petunia did not stop to look at all the wonders. She walked quickly through the crowd, her eyes darting here and there, searching for plump little Cicero.

Suddenly, "There he is!" Petunia cried and grabbed Porky's arm.

Porky swung around. He, too, thought he saw Cicero's face in the crowd around a booth. But when they ran to the spot, there was no Cicero in sight.

CICERO GOES TO THE FAIR

"Have you seen a fat little boy?" Petunia asked a taffy-apple seller.

"Lotsa little boys, Miss," the man told her. "Boys everywhere."

"Wh-What we ought t-to d-do is t-take a r-ride on the f-ferris wh-wheel," Porky suggested. "F-From there we c-could s-see the whole f-fair g-grounds."

"I guess you're right," Petunia agreed.

So up they went on the ferris wheel. As their chair swung high in the air, Porky and Petunia peered anxiously in all directions, hoping for a sight of Cicero below.

"I s-see him!" Porky cried suddenly. "There he is!"

Petunia's eyes followed his pointing finger, and sure enough, there was Cicero, looking very tiny far below. He was leaning against a wooden booth.

"Cicero!" Petunia cried, leaning out to shake a finger at him. "Cicero! Come here this minute!"

Petunia heard the people in the next seat laugh, and then she remembered where she was. She settled down again, feeling rather silly.

Then the ferris wheel creaked to a stop. But Porky and Petunia were stopped at the very top!

It made Petunia dizzy to sit there and look out while the seat swayed to and fro under them. Worse still, when the wheel started turning again, she caught one glimpse of Cicero, running into a building. Then he was gone from sight.

When at last Porky and Petunia reached the ground and climbed out of their seats, they hurried toward the building where Petunia had last seen Cicero. But he was nowhere to be found.

"L-Let's l-look in the b-barns where th-they keep the p-prize animals," Porky suggested.

"Cicero always liked animals," Petunia agreed.

When they entered the animal barns, she stood stock still in amazement.

At one end of the big barn stood a stern-faced man in an official-looking uniform. He was watching a dozen scared little boys who were trudging around with buckets of water and armloads of feed for the animals. Cicero was among them, and he looked tired enough to drop.

"This'll teach you not to sneak in without buying a ticket!" the man said.

"Let's leave him here," Petunia giggled. "It will be a good lesson for him."

"I'll b-bet he w-wishes he'd s-stayed home and r-raked the lawn!" Porky smiled.

And that was exactly what poor, tired little Cicero was wishing.
